and Dan Stark, Minnesota DNR, Wolf Management Specialist

Minnesota has the largest wolf population in the lower 48 states after making a significant recovery over the last forty years. In 2012, one year after being removed from the Threatened Species list of the Federal Endangered Species Act, Minnesota allowed the hunting of wolves. The Minnesota Court of Appeals recently upheld the DNR's authority to set wolf hunting seasons, and plans for a 2013 season are underway. However, not all Minnesotans agree with this course of action. Join others in the community to hear experts on both sides of the issue and get your questions answered.
